One of the core problems of spotting problems such as behavioral disorders is the symptoms. Aside from symptoms that can easily be identified as typical childhood responses, some of the clearer signs are only manifest in older patients. Things such as stealing, conduct disorder, vigilantism, and vandalism are all signs that can only definitively be identified in older children.

In younger ones, vandalism may be little more than the natural curiosity some children have towards taking their toys apart, an outcrop of their natural curiosity. This reliance on signs that can either be mistaken or do not immediately manifest are the main issues that bottleneck attempts to establish a system for diagnosing children with mental health disorders.
