However studies so far undertaken do not sort out all other variables that may give the same result. The researchers interpreted the improvement as due to two factors. The first factor, probably more important for faster gains, was in overcoming "learned non-use" of the weaker arm. The idea is that after a stroke, patients quickly learn to avoid using the weaker arm to a greater extent than its impairment might warrant, and Cl training forces them to put it back into action.

The second suspected factor, developing more slowly, was "neural plasticity" or actual rewiring of the brain. In neural plasticity surviving brain cells - previously uninvolved or less involved in controlling use of the arm - attempt to make up for the lost brain cells either by creating new contacts with other brain cells or by modifying the effectiveness of existing links.
